The morning after election day the returns of Albany County as filed with the County Clerk showed that Henry Russell (Rep.) had been elected Senator by eight majority. Six days after election day two personatic inspectors of election in the town of Watervieit proffered a new return of the result in that town, by which fortyfive votes were transferred from Russell to Chase (Dem.). They based their action upon an affidavit made by a Democratic Supervisor named Leary that he had fraudently counted forty-five votes of Chase for Russell. This fraudulent return has been accepted by the Democratic Board of Supervisors, and they propose P. H. VOSE & CO. upon it to grant the certificate to Chase. But the Republicans fought this action in the courts. They came before Judge Inthe sourts. Lady Montharry continued, "and to thank her personally for her extreme kindness. But I was informed that she had gone out, without leaving word at what hour she might be expected to return. I have written a little note of thanks, saying that we hope to have the pleasure of personally expressing our sense of Mrs. James' courtesy to-morrow. In the meantime, Agnes, I have ordered your

With these words Lady Montbarry left Miss Lockwood to make a hasty toilet for

The new room at once produced a favorable suppression on Agnes The large window, opening into a balcony, commanded an admirable view of the canal The decora tions on the walls and callings were carefully copied from the exquisitely graceful designs copied from the exquisitely graceful designs of Rophael in the Vatican. The massive was frobe possessed compartments of un usual size in which double the number of dresses that Agnes possessed might have convenently hung at full length. In the inner corner of the room, near the head of the bed stead, there was a recess which had been turned into a little dressing from and which opened by a second door on the inferior stair case of the hotal commonly used by the servants. was just over the head of the bed The next instant she alarmed Agnes by starting to her feet with a cry of terror, and pointing to a small brown spot on one of the white paneled spaces of the carved esiling "It's a spot of blood!" the child exclaimed "Take me away! I won't sleep here!"

Seeing plainly that it would be useless to reason with her while she was in the room, Agnes hurriedly wrapped Marian in a dressing gown and carried ber back to her mother in the drawing room. Here the ladies did that best to soothe and reassure the trumbling girl. The effort proved to be necles: their best to soothe and reasure the trumbling girl. The effort proved to be useless; the impression that had been produced on the young and sensitive mind was not to be removed by persuasion. Marian could give no explanation of the panie and ferror that had seized her She was quite unable to say why the spot on the calling looked like the color of a spot of blood. She only knew that she should die of terror if she saw it again. Under these circumstances, but one alternative was left. It was arranged that the child should pass the night in the room occupied by her two younger steamy and the nurse.

In half an hour more larging with a processing the start was left. They desired a processing the start when the sect. They desired a processing the start when the sect. "I suspect the nurse is in some way answerable for what has happened," Agnes suggested 'She may quite possibly have been telling Marian some trage nursery story which has left its mischievous impression behind it. Persons in her position are sadly ignorant of the danger of exciting a child's imagination. You had better caution the nurse to-morans. Lady Montberry looked round the room night in Venice.

CHAPTER XXII.

Having closed and secured the door on Lady Moubarry's departure, Agens put on her dressing gown and, turning to her open horse, began the business of unpacking. In the bury of making her tollet for dinner she had taken the first dress that lay uppermost in the trunk and had thrown her braveling costume on the bed. She now opened the doors of the wordrobe for the first time and began to hang her dresses on the hooks in the laige commertment on one side.

After a few innuities only of this accupation she grow weary of it and decided on leaving the trunks as they were until the next morning. The oppressive south wind which had blown throughout the day still prevailed at night. The atmosphere of the room felt close, Agnes throw a shawl over her head and shoulders and opening the window stepped into the balcony to look at the view.

The night was heavy and overcast nothing could be destinately seen.

Leaning on the purapet of the balcony, Agnes looked vacantly into the black void beneath. Her thoughts reverted to the miserable man who had broken his pledged faith to ber and who had tied in that house. Some change scemed to have come new influence appeared to be at work. For the first time in her experience of herself compassion and legred were not the only emotions aroused in her by the remombrance of the dead Montharry. A keen sense of the wrong that she had suffered, never yet felt by it now. Site found herself thinking of the brashly as Henry Westweek had thought of them—she who had rebuked him the last time he had spoken slightingly of his brother in the reservement. A sudden fear and doubt of thereself startled her physically as well as morally. She turned from the shadowy abys of the dark water as if the mystery and the gloom of it had been answerable for the emotions which had taken her by surprise Abruptly closing the window, she three usade her ashwal and lit the candles on the mantel piece impelied by a sudden craxing for light in the salutude of her room.

The cheering bri

Would it be well (she asked herself) to get ready for bod? No! The sense of drowsy fatigue that she had felt half an hour since was going. She returned to the dull employ ment of unpacking her boxes. After a few minutes only the occupation became irksome to her once more. She sat down by the table and took up aguide book. Suppose I inform myself, the thought, "on the subject of Venice?

myself " she thought, "on the subject of Venued". He attention wandered from the book before she had turned the first page of it. The image of Henry Westwick was the present image in her memory now Recalling the minutest incidents and details of the evening she could think of nothing which presented him under other than a favorable and interesting aspect. She similed to herself softly her color rose by fine gradation as she felt the full luxury of dwelling on the perfect truth and modesty of his devotion to her was the depression of spirits from which she had suffered so persistently on her travels attributable, by any channer, to their long separation from each other—imbittered, peinlaps, by her own vain regret when she remembered her rash reception of him in Paris? Suddenly ration from each other—imbittered, pethaps, by her own vain regret when she remembered her righ reception of him in Paris? Suddenly conscious of this bold question and of the self abandonment which it implied, she returned mechanically to her hook, startled by the unrestrained liberty of her own thoughts. What larking tempfations to forbidden tenderness find their holding places in a worman's dressing gown when she is alone in her room at night! With her heart in this tomb of the dead Montbarry, could Agnes even think of another man and think of love? How shameful! how unworthy of her! For the second time she tried to interest herself in the guide book—and once more she tried in vain Throwing the book aside she turned desperately to the one resource that was left, to her luggage-resolved to fatigue herself without mercy until she was weary enough and sleepy enough until she was weary enough and sleepy enough clothes from the trunk to the wardrobe. The large clock in the ball, striking middight reminded her that it was getting late. She sat down for a moment in an arm chair by the bedisade to rest.

The alence in the house new caught her attention and held it—held it disagreeably. Was everybody in bed and asleep but herself! Surely it was time for her to follow the general example? With a certain irritable nervous haste she rose and again undressed herself. "I have lost two hours of rest," she thought, frowning at the reflection of herself in the glass as the arranged her hair for the night. I shall be good for nothing to-morrow?

As the welcome light diffused over the room she turned from the table and looked toward the other side of the bed. In the moment when she turned the chill of a sudden terror gripped her round the heart, as with the clasp of an key hand. She was not alone in her room!

There-in the chair at the bedside

There—in the chair at the bedside—there, suddanly revealed under the flow of light from the candle, was the figure of a woman recheng. Her head lay back over the chair Her face, turned up to the ce ling had the oyes closed as if sho was wrapped in a deep sieep.

The shock of the discovery held Agnes speechless and helpless. Her first conscious action when she was in some degree mistress of herself again was to lea rover the bed and to look closer at the woman who had so in comprehensibly stolen into her room in the dead of night. One glance was enough, she started back with a rey of amazement. The person in the chair was no other than the widow of the dead Montbarry—the woman who had warned her that they were to meet again, and that the place might be venice!

Her course returned to her, sting into action by the natural sense of indignation which the presence of the courtes provoked

One glance was enough Wake up!" she called out "How dare you come here? How did you get in! Leave the room or I will call for help: the room or I will call for help!.'

She raised her voice at the last words It produced no effect Leaning further over the bed she heldly took the countess by the shoulder and shook her. Not even this effort succeeded in rousing the sleeping woman. She still lay back in the chair, possessed by a torpor like the torpor of death—insensible to sound insensible to touch. Was she really sleeping? Or had she fainted?

Agnes looked closer at her. She had not fainted. Her breathing was andthe rising and falling, in deep heavy gasps. At intervals she ground her teeth savagely. Bends of perspiration stood thickly on her forehead. Her cliniched hands rose and fell slowly from time to time on her late. Was she in the agony of a dream? or was she spiratually conscious of something hidd. It is, the room!

The doubt involved in that hat question was unendurable. Agnes determined to rouse the servants who kept watch in the hotel at night. She raised her voice at the last words It

"I felt strongly tempted to tell you, even them—but your steeping arrangements for the night were all made, I should only have inconvenienced and alarmed you. I smitzed tall the morning, after hearing from the property brother that you had yourself seen to your security from any intrusion. How that strusion was accomplished it is impossible to easy I can only declare that the countess' presence by your bedside last night was no dream of yours. On her own authority is an easily "On her own authority if Agnes repeated, eagerly "Have you seen her this morning?" "I have seen her not ten minutes since." "What was she doing?" "She was basily engaged in writing I could not even get her to look at me until I thought of meationing your name." "She remembered me, of course?" "She remembered me, of course?" "She remembered you with some clusionty Finding that she wouldn't answer me on any other terms, I questioned her as if I had come direct from you. Then the spoke. She not only admitted that she had the same superstitious motive for placing you in that room, which she had acknowledged to Frances—she even owned that she had been by your bedside, watching through the night, to see what you saw, as she expressed it. Hearing this, I tried to persuade her to tell me how alse get into the room. Unluckily, her manuscript on the table caught her eye, she returned to her writing "The baron wants mossy," she said, 'I must get on with my play,' What she saw, or dreamed, while she was in your room last night, it is at present impossible to discover But, judging by my brother's account of her, as well as by what I remember of her myself, some recent influence has been at work which has produced a marked change in this wretched woman for the worse. Her mind is, in cortain respects imquestionably deranged — one proof of it is that she spoke to me of the buren as if he were still a living man. When Francis saw her, she declared that the baron was dead which is the truth. The Unit seems to be entirely absorbed an one absurd dea—the idea of writing a play for Francis to bring out at his theatre. He admits that his encouraged her to bope she might get money in this way. I think he did wrong Don't you agree with me?

Without heeding the question Agnes rose abruptly from her chair.

'Do me one more kindness, Henry," she said. 'Take me to the countess at once."

Henry hesitated "Are you composed enough to see her, after the shock that you have suffered." he asked. She trambled, the flush on her face died away, and left it deadly pale. But she he if to her resolution. 'You have heard of what I saw last ight?" she said, faintly.

Don't speak of it!? Henry interposed. "Don't selessiy agitate yourself."

I must spar! My mind is full of horning duestions about it. I know I can't identify it—and yet I ask myself over and over ag in in whose lifeness off it appear? Was it in the likeness of I train! or was it—She stopped shuddering. The countess knows, I must see the countess' she resumed, veheneitly. Witcher my counage fails me or not I must make it a attempt. To ome to her before I have time to feel affined of it!

Henry looked in ther anytonals. "For this realso! In the p esent state of her mind, I doubt it she will be much longer capable of realizing her wild idea of you as the averaging at gel who is to bring her to a reckoning for her evil deeds. It may be well to try what your influence can do while she is still capable of feeling it. He waited to hear what Agnes would say she took his arm and led him in silence to the door.

No more of that," she cried "Oh, Jesu Marial Do you think I want to be told what you saw? Do you think I don't know what it means for you and for me? Decide for yourself, miss Examine your own mind Aro you well assured that the day of reckoning has come at last? Are you leady to follow me back, through the crimes of the past, to the secrets of the dead?"

She turned again to the writing cible, with out walting to be answered. Her eyes flashed, she looked like her old self once more as she spoke. It was only for a moment. The old spoke. It was only for a moment. The old arder and impetuestry were nearly worn out. Her bead sunk she sighed heavily as she un locked a desk which stood on the table. Opening a drawer in the desk, the took out a leaf of vellum, covered with finded writing. Some ragged ends of silken thread were still attached to the leaf, as if it had been torn out of a book. of a book.

The countess proceeded along the westward curridor and stopped at the door numbered Tharty-eight. This was the room which had been inhabited by Baron Rivar in the old days of the palace; the room situated immediately over the bed chember in which Agnes had passed the night 'For the last-two days it had been empty. The absence of luggage in it when they opened the door showed that it had not yet been let.

"You see," said the countess, pointing to the carved figure at the fire place, "and you know what to do they are they are they are they on, in lower tones. "Give me a few hours more to myself. The faron wants money—I.

on, in lower tones. "Give me a few hours more to myself. The faron wants money—I must get on with my jeay."

She smiled vacantly and imitated the action of writing with hear right hand as she pronounced the last words. The effort of concentrating her weakened mind on other and less familiar topics than the constant want of money in the baron's lifetime, and the vague prospect of gain from the still unfinished play, had evidently exhausted her poor reserves of strength. When her request had been granted she acdressed no expressions of gratitude to Agnes, she only said. Feel no fear miss, of my attempting to escape you. Where you are there I must be till the end comes."

Mob Against Mob.

(Chicago Inter-Ocean.) It is peculiar that "negro insurrections" always occur in the Southern tier of States during an election excitement. They seem to be as needful a part of a political campaign l. Louisinians bands and banners in Illinois. And the negro always $125 00 gets the worst of it. It is strange.

phatic declaration that his success is to be $150.00 regarded as the announcement of a stead-CALLAND SEE! of labor. That there may be no mistake as to the intent of the Democratic party of Louisians, it condems the extremely conservative statement of ex-Governor Nicholis, himself a Democrat , Governor Nicholls, maiser: a Democracy I am thoroughly satisfied that any course of political action traced on a narrower line than the good of the whole people, regardless of color or condition, must inevitably lead to disaster and ruin.

And approves this statement of the present and prospective Governor: This election is to determine whether the blacks shall rule the whites or the whiterule the blacks.

Such declarations against the rights of citizenship, wherewith the colored men, who are almost the only laborers of the State, are endowed by the Constitution of the United States, are direct incentives to violent resistance. Whether they were uttered with the latent of provoking viclence or not, the violence was, nevertheless, lawless, and should have been suppressed and punished by law. But it was not. The last thing desired by its white inciters was a public trial of the merits of the case. And this events fully prove. In the first place, the preliminary alleged ontbreak was easily repressed by troops. Pence reigned. A few rioters were arrested by a sheriff's posse. Were they held for trial? By no means. They were shot by a mob of white Democrats, while under ostensible guard of the sheriff's men. It does not appear that any of the pretended guard were shot. Here then is, at best, one mob wreaking vengeance on the leaders of another mob. The Governor has not denounced nor the press complained of the white mob. Still later two negro leaders, or alleged leaders, of another mob of workmen are taken out of jail and hung by a white mob. Does an alleged black mob. And, of course, the white mob is the more numerous and the better armed.

The Inter-Occan has time and again relicented the unavoidable truth that peace can not dwell with injustice, have can not be enforced by lawlessaess. Louisians is striving to enforce these impossible conditions. It is striving to dispossess citizens of their rights and at the same time to enforce them to content. It can not be, it is against nature. As Governor Nicholls must it. "Any multiteal agains based on a strict of the comments and book reviews."

The Latest Barber Shop Joke.
Have you heard the latest gag! Well, this is it. You go into a barber shop or cigar store and presently somebody will begin talking bat, and after awhite the man who works the trick will get around to the point where he asks you if you have ever seen a red bat. Of course you answer no. Then he asks you if you would like to see a red hat. You say that you don't mind, and he goes back in the shop and brings forward a paper box, carefully tied and plentifully performed with holes. He begins to untie and you grow nervous and alarmed lest the bat makes its escape. If you are foolish enough to soy "Looi out, or he'll fly away!" then you get the laugh on you, for the joker will uncover the box and show you a red bat sure cough—a red brickbut.—Globe-Democrat. The above paragraph is not particularly important, but the Herald's exclusion of the Representative of this District from the ranks of "practical prohibitionists," or those who "turn glasses down" as the Herald parts it, will occasion no little amusement in view of Mr. Boutelle's well known temperance babtis both in public and private life, as well as his unwarying advocacy of the prohibitory law in the columns of this paper.

BY WILKIE COLLINS

As the welcome light diffused over the room spe turned from the table and looked toward the other side of the bed In the moment when she turned the chill of a sudden terror gripped her round the hear*, as with the clasp of an may hand. She was not alone in her room!

as with the class of an my hand.
She was not alone in her room!
There—in the chair at the bedside—there, suddenly rowaled under the flow of light from the candle, was the figure of a woman reclining. Her head lay back over the chair Her face, turned up to the calling, had the eyes closed, as if she was wrapped in a deep sleep.
The shock of the discovery hald Agnes speechless and halpless. Her first conscious action when she was in some degree mistress of herself again was to lean over the bed and to look closes at the woman who had so in comprihensibly stolen into her room in the dead of night. One glance was enough, she started back with a cry of amazement. The person in the chair was no other than the widow of the dead Montbarry—the woman who had wained her that they were to meet again and that the place might be Veince!
Her courage returned to her sting into action by the natural sense of indignation which the presence of the countess provoked.

"I have now completed my literary survey of the first floor of the palace. At the desire of my noble and gracious patron the lord of this glorious addice, I next assend to the second floor, and centime my catalogue or description of the pictures, decorations, and other treasures of art therein contained. Let me begin with the corner room at the western extremity of the palace, called the Room of the Caryatiles, from the statues which support the mantelprece. This work is of comparatively recent execution it dates from the Eghicentic century only, and reveals the corrupt tasts of the period in every part of it. Still, there is a certain in terest which attaches to the mantelprece it conceals a tleverly constructed hiding place between the floor of the room and the college of the room beneath which was made during the last ovil days of the inquisition in Vinice, and which is reported to have saved an ancestor of my gracious lord pursued by that turnibe tribunal. The machinery of this curious place of concealment has been kept in good order by the present lord as a species of curiosity. He condescended to show me the method of working it. Approaching the two Caryatides rest your hand on the forelead (indway between the eyebrows) of the figure which is on your left as you stand opposts to the fire pace, then press the head inward as if you were pushing it against the wall behind By doing this you set in motion the hidden machinery in the wall which turns the hearth some on a pivot and discloses the hollow place below. Henry lifted his hand once more to the mar bit forelicad of the figure. For the second time he was checked on the point of setting the machinery of the hiding place in motion. On this occasion the interpretation came from an outrient of friendly voices in the corridor. A woman's voice exclaimed. Dealest Agnes, how glad I am to see you again. A man's voice followed of fering to introduce some friend to "Missipor and the first open of the manager of the loosely became and the voice of the manager of the housekeeper to show the ladies and gentlement the vacant apartments at the other end of the corridor. "The supernatural influences have spaid one this time? Henry answered. "Perhaps you may yet flad that they have affected some other members of the family. He spoke gravely resenting the familiar tone in which the manager had referred to he previous visit to the hotel. Mrs. Arthur Barri le and their traveling companios. Miss. Lockwood is with them, looking at the income. They will be herr before long, it they find it convenient to have an extra room at their disposal.

This announcement decided Henry on exploring the hiding place before the interruption occurred. I had crossed his mind when Agnes left him that he ought, perhaps, to have a witness in the not very probable event of some alarming discovery taking place. The too familiar manager, suspecting nothing, was there at his disposal. He turned again to the Caryan figure, miliciously resolving to make the manager his witness.

"I am delighted to hear that our friends have arrived at hist," he said. "Before I slake liands with them let me as! you a question about this quest work of art hare. I saw photographs of it down stairs. Are they for sale?

"Do you think the chimney place is as solid as it looks?" Henry proceeded. "When you came in I was just wondering whether this figure here had not accidentally got loosened from the wall behind it." He lidd his hand on the marble forehead for the thrift time. "To my eye it looks a little one of the poppendicular I almost fancy I could jog the head just now when I tomoled it." He pressed the head inward as he said those words.

A sound of farving from was instantly andible behind the wall. The solid hearthstone in front of the fireplace turnes; slowly at the feet of the two men, and disclosed a dark eavity below.
